Vietnam Journalist Aims To Fight Red Propaganda

The urgency of the fight against Red propaganda in the Republic of Vietnam was the main factor which influenced Pham Xuan An, 32, of Saigon to embrace journalism as a career.

Pham, who recently was graduated from the Orange Coast College in Costa Mesa, Orange County, will spend three months at The Sacramento Bee, studying American newspaper operations and learning the practical aspects of his college course.

He came to the United States under the auspices of the international cooperation administration. His stay in Sacramento is sponsored by the Asian Foundation with headquarters in San Francisco.

Psychological Warfare

Member of a family of four, Pham was employed by the psychological warfare department of Vietnam during the 1954 campaign against the government now maintains a tight censorship on all newspapers as a matter of necessity because otherwise the Reds would have a field day in spreading their ideas throughout the country.

Nine Dailies

There are nine daily newspapers in Saigon, the country's capital. Among them there are six Vietnamese publications, one French, one English and one Chinese.

All have a rather small circulation, he said, because few people can afford to buy them every day. But, he added, it is common practice to rent or swap newspapers.

"Our people are poor," he concluded, "but they are eager to learn, from the students to the rickshaw men."

He said he plans to join the staff of one of the Vietnamese dailies when he returns to
